

Dr Arash Vahidnia – is currently a Senior Lecture and Program Manager in the School of Engineering at RMIT University, Melbourne. He received his PhD in power engineering from Queensland University of Technology (QUT) and was a Research Fellow within the power engineering group at QUT before joining RMIT. He is also a Senior member of IEEE and has several years of industry experience working at power consultancy and utility firms. His research interests include system stability, wide-area control, microgrids, power and energy system planning, integration of renewable energy sources and control of renewable rich power systems.